High-Throughput Screening

Abstract • The effects of the following factors were examined on the feeding behavior of the larval zebrafish (Danio rerio): temperature, photoperiod, and water quality. Feeding frequency was significantly affected by temperature and photoperiod. Feeding frequency increased with increasing temperature up to 28°C and decreased thereafter. Feeding frequency also increased with increasing photoperiod up to 16 h light per day and decreased thereafter. Water quality had no significant effect on feeding frequency. Feeding volume was significantly affected by temperature and photoperiod. Feeding volume increased with increasing temperature up to 28°C and decreased thereafter. Feeding volume also increased with increasing photoperiod up to 16 h light per day and decreased thereafter. Water quality had no significant effect on feeding volume. These results suggest that temperature and photoperiod are important factors affecting the feeding behavior of the larval zebrafish.
